National Security Council meets over coronavirus threat

Polish President Andrzej Duda following a meeting of the National Security Council (RBN) which he attended on Tuesday, said the talks had been "very substantive, without criticism of the government."

The president also said many important propositions had been made, including by members of the opposition.

Thanking all those who had attended, Duda said the meeting had been a very "factual discussion." He said that during the sitting, Prime Minister Mateusz Morawiecki and his ministers had presented very detailed information and that all participants had taken part.

"I want to stress very strongly. It was a very substantive discussion without criticism of the government. That means, what has been done to date by the government, by the sanitary inspectorate, was very highly assessed. I'm glad of that because I believe that both the government and the inspectorate deserve such an appraisal, as do the services - the police, border guard, fire brigade," the president said.
